Interviewing Guide

Congratulations! If you have been invited for an interview, it means you’ve made it past the first stages of screening. The employer wants to gauge if you would be a good fit for the position. Most of the tips here are focused on interviews outside academe, but many apply to academic interviews, as well.

How to Prepare

Research the organization. Have a thorough understanding of the organization’s mission and the role you would play in it. Spend time on their website and social media pages.

Visit the LinkedIn profiles of your interviewers in order to learn more about their own career paths and interests.

Reach out to anyone you know at the company or organization to better understand the position and the company culture.

Print out the position description for the interview so you can address how you would solve the employer’s needs.

Prepare for behavioral interview questions. Use the STAR method: give specific examples of a Situation or Task, the Action you took, and talk about the Results you achieved.

If applying for an expanded career, be prepared to explain your decision to leave academia. Prepare answers on why you want to use the skills you gained in graduate school to benefit the company or the organization.

Schedule a mock interview to practice professional demeanor and answer unanticipated questions.

Prepare a list of questions for your interviewers. Develop thoughtful questions on the values and culture of the company and what they expect the new hire to accomplish. Avoid asking questions that could easily be answered from their website.

On the day of your interview, dress professionally and appropriately.

Give yourself plenty of time to arrive early to the interview.

During the Interview

Maintain eye contact with your interviewers. Eliminate distractions, such as cell phones.

Keep it positive. Don’t talk negatively about your advisor, past work experiences, or issues with your graduate program.

Use language that your interviewers will understand. Avoid topics of a highly technical nature unless the position involves work of a highly technical nature.

Listen to your interviewers. You are there not just to talk about yourself, but to learn more about the company.

Do not inquire about benefits, salary, or vacation time until the employer has offered you a position.

After the Interview

After the interview, send an email to thank your interviewer(s) within 24 hours of the meeting and re-iterate your interest in the position.
